

the interest and improve the playing from a scientific standpoint.

So far the professional element has been kept out of the game. This is as it should be. Professional sports are very good under certain conditions, but it would be suicidal to introduce professionalism in Association foot ball in the United States. The game, like Caesar's wife, must be "above suspicion," and as long as it is controlled by amateurs its growth and development is assured. The Intercollegiate Association Foot Ball League can do much for the game, and if the college authorities will only give it proper recognition the senior colleges and "prep" schools are certain to adopt it, knowing that the hours spent in mastering the details of the game will not be thrown away by the students when entering one of the big universities.

The elimination of rowdyism and appointment of properly qualified officials will have an important bearing on the game. With organized leagues in all important centers this is being rapidly accomplished, and never since the introduction of Association foot ball in the United States has the outlook been as promising as at present.
